MARCH, NINETEEN HUNDRED AND NINETEEN

THE LAW SCHOOL.—On April 6th, 1917, when the United States declared war upon Germany, there were 517 students in the Law School. That these men proved true to the traditions of the school and the profession is best indicated by the fact that in September, 1918, the total enrollment had dwindled to 48 students, most of whom were disqualified for military service. The corresponding depletion of the Board of Editors of the REVIEW to 3 men made it impossible to continue it as a strictly students' publication, which it has been since its foundation in 1900. It was accordingly decided that the REVIEW be temporarily discontinued rather than turned into a Faculty journal.

The outlook for the school at the beginning of the present academic year was anything but encouraging, but the Faculty stood firm by its belief that the organization should be kept intact in order that the school should be prepared for the large registration which was inevitable following the war. Accordingly, with one or two exceptions, every course was continued throughout the period of the war irrespective of the size of the classes. In addition the Faculty provided courses in Military Law to accommodate some 500 S. A. T. C. students during the autumn months.
